taught the world two things only—to fitness.

If only the quarter of the time was If only the quarter of the time was spent on physical as on mental development, he insisted, each of the students would be a perfect physical specimen. He warned that the strong body with the less cultured mind wins the battle over the individual who is only smart; the keen fellow who can't last loses out.

He denounced parental indulgence which avoids the old-fashioned way of finding tasks for the youth and now seeks to make all his paths pleasant. The boy used to have work to do as soon as he got out of school in the old way; now vacation spots are picked out for him.

"The successes in life love work more

The successes in life love work more than the failures love idleness," he declared. He considered the indulged son of a wealthy parentage to be commisserated; the boy or girl with ambition, poverty, sense and strength, to be congratulated.

meeting the problems of existence. This constituted the preparedness of the individual more than any other factor, in his opinion. In human training he so often found that little attention is paid to physical development and mental ability is given exclusive care, with the result that mental destrity becomes afterward a sacrifice to physical power.

Nerve, muscle and constitution, he urged is necessary for the competition of life. He suggested an educational system that would decline a diploma until the hollow chest, and spindle shanks are gone, with physical stamina substituted. He considered it the important thing about the physical life of America today that only the barest
